Further, it recognizes explicitly that both women and men have gender: "gender and aging" refers to everyone, and not just to women. From this standpoint, gender is taken to be characteristic of both social organizations and identities, embedded in social relationships at all levels, from individual interactions to institutional processes. Men and women gain identities and power in relation to one another with important ramifications for life chances (Hess 1992).

Centenarians and Aging. As for people who make it to 100 or beyond, called centenarians, men and women can both get to this age, though women are more likely to make it than men. However, there are some differences between men and women who make it to age 100. These statistics are based on a classic 2003 study: 4.

How Is Aging Different for Men and Women?

The double standard of aging" is a phrase heard so frequently that it seems a truism. The social worth of women has been linked more closely with their physical appearance compared to the situation for men, and these social valuations decline more markedly with age for women than they do for men (e.g., Hurd, 2000).
